

Contract Law and the Legislature

Autonomy, expectations, and the making of legal doctrine

York Law School
11 & 12 January 2019

This two-day workshop seeks to revisit, reframe, and reconsider key debates about the nature and shape of contract law in the light of the impact that statutes have had on its development. Although theoretical scholarship on contract looks primarily to court decisions for principles and structure, statutes are also an important means through which political, social, and normative considerations influence contract law. Legislative action is potentially as significant as judicial decisions in understanding contract law and the principles that underpin it.

By bringing together a collection of papers focused specifically on contract statutes, this workshop seeks to produce an altered and more complete picture of modern contract law. The papers examine a broad range of statutes, and consider the general themes that characterise legislative action in relation to contract as well as the implications of legislation for how the law of contract is conceptualised, discussed, and taught.

Attendance at the workshop is free, and is open to individuals at any stage of their career including doctoral students and early career academics. Advance registration is, however, necessary so we can have an idea of the numbers attending. If you are interested in attending, please email the organisers at <t.t.arvind@york.ac.uk>
